Summary

The session began with an interactive discussion on Kolb's Learning Cycle, where participants identified their dominant learning styles and engaged in group activities to apply the cycle's stages to real-life scenarios. Through reflective exercises, they recognized the importance of integrating all stages for comprehensive learning.

The second part of the class introduced Bloom's Taxonomy, focusing on its application in instructional design. Participants worked in groups to create objectives at various levels of Bloom's hierarchy, from simple recall to higher-order critical thinking and problem-solving.

Finally, the session explored Educational Philosophies, with a comparative analysis of key philosophies shaping education. Participants engaged in a debate on how traditional and modern philosophies influence teaching today, followed by a case study activity to evaluate their practical implications in the classroom. The session concluded with participants sharing insights on applying these concepts in their teaching practices, fostering a reflective and collaborative learning environment.
